easily acquired. It is not in contemplation that these schools give full and exhaustive instruction in even a few branches of military science, but the government wisely lends its assistance and gives its encouragement to the end that the military spirit of the nation may be fostered and such basic knowledge of military art and science may be acquired by our young men as shall enable them, in the exigency of war, quickly to qualify them as officers and soldiers.

Instead of this military feature being sneered at, as being for mere display and parade, it should be commended and encouraged and insisted upon as a right and necessary part of the education of every American boy.
